

1

The body floated face down in the murky water of the canal. Gently, the ebbing tide tugged it along towards the open waters of the laguna that spread out beyond the end of the canal. The head bumped a few times against the moss-covered steps of the embankment in front of the Basilica of Santi Giovanni e Paolo, lodged there for a moment, then shifted free as the feet swung out in a delicate balletic arc that pulled it loose and set it again drifting towards the open waters and freedom.

Close by, the bells of the church chimed four in the morning, and the waters slowed, as if ordered to do so by the bell.

Gradually, they slowed even more, until they reached that moment of utter stillness that separates the tides, when the waters wait for the new tide to take over the day's work. Caught in the calm, the limp thing bobbed on the surface of the water, dark-clad and invisible. Time passed in silence and then was broken by two men who walked by, chatting in soft voices filled with the easy sibilance of the Venetian dialect. One of them pushed a low cart loaded with newspapers which he was taking back to his newsstand to begin the day; the other was on his way to work in the hospital that took up one entire side of the vast open campo.

Out in the laguna, a small boat pattered past, and the tiny waves it raised rippled up the canal and toyed with the body, shifting it back up against the embankment wall.

As the bells chimed five, a woman in one of the houses that overlooked the canal and faced onto the campo flung open the dark-green shutters of her kitchen and turned back to lower the flaming gas under her coffee pot. Still not fully awake, she spooned sugar into a small cup, flipped off the gas with a practised motion of her wrist, and poured a thick stream of coffee into her cup. Cradling it in her hands, she walked back to the open window and, as she had every morning for decades, looked across at the giant equestrian statue of Colleoni, once the most fearsome of all Venetian military leaders, now her nearest neighbour. For Bianca Pianaro, this was the most peaceful moment of the day, and Colleoni, cast into eternal bronze silence centuries ago, the perfect companion for this precious, secret quarter-hour of silence.

Glad of its sharp warmth, she sipped at her coffee, watching the pigeons that had already begun to peck their way towards the base of the statue. Idly, she glanced directly below her, to where her husband's small boat bobbed in the dark-green water. It had rained in the night, and she looked to see if the canvas tarpaulin that covered the boat was still in place. If the tarpaulin had been pulled free by the wind, Nino would have to go down and bail the boat out before he went to work. She leaned out, providing herself a clear view of the bow. At first, she thought it was a bag of rubbish, swept from the embankment by the night's tide. But it was strangely symmetrical, elongated, with two branches sweeping out on either side of the central trunk, almost as if it were . . .

'Oh, Dio,' she gasped and let her coffee cup fall into the waters below, not far from the strange shape floating face down in the canal. 'Nino, Nino,' she screamed, turning back towards their bedroom. 'There's a body in the canal.'

It was this same message, 'There's a body in the canal', that woke Guido Brunetti twenty minutes later. He shifted up onto his left shoulder and pulled the phone onto the bed with him. 'Where?'

'Santi Giovanni e Paolo. In front of the hospital, sir,' answered the policeman who had called him as soon as the call came into the Questura.

'What happened? Who found him?' Brunetti asked, swinging his feet out from beneath the covers and sitting up on the edge of the bed.

'I don't know, sir. A man named Pianaro called to report it.'

'So why did you call me?' Brunetti asked, making no attempt to hide the irritation in his voice, the clear result of the time indicated on the glowing face of the clock beside the bed: five-thirty-one. 'What about the night shift? Isn't anyone there?'

'They've all gone home, sir. I called Bozzetti, but his wife said he wasn't home yet.' As he spoke, the young man's voice grew more and more uncertain. 'So I called you, sir, because I know you're working day shift.' Which, Brunetti reminded himself, began in two and a half hours. He said nothing.

'Are you there, sir?'

'Yes, I'm here. And it's five-thirty.'

'I know, sir,' the young man bleated. 'But I couldn't find anyone else.'

'All right. All right. I'll go down there and have a look. Send me a launch. Now.' Remembering the hour and the fact that the night shift had already gone off duty, he asked, 'Is there anyone who can bring it?'

'Yes, sir. Montisi just came in. Shall I send him?'

'Yes, right now. And call the rest of the day shift. Tell them to meet me there.'

'Yes, sir,' the young man responded, his relief audible at having someone take charge.

'And call Doctor Rizzardi. Ask him to meet me there as quickly as he can.'

'Yes, sir. Anything else, sir?'

'No, nothing. But send the launch. Right now. And tell the others, if they get there before I do, to close things off. Don't let anyone get near the body.' Even as they spoke, how much evidence was being destroyed, cigarettes dropped on the ground, shoes scuffed across the pavement? Without saying anything further, he hung up.

Beside him in the bed, Paola moved and looked up at him with one eye, the other covered by a naked arm against the invasion of light. She made a noise that long experience told him was an inquisitive one.

'A body. In a canal. They're coming to get me. I'll call.' The noise with which she acknowledged this was an affirmative one. She rolled onto her stomach and was asleep immediately, certainly the only person in the entire city uninterested in the fact that a body had been found floating in one of the canals.

He dressed quickly, decided not to spend the time shaving, and went into the kitchen to see if there was time for coffee. He opened the lid of the Moka Express and saw about an inch of coffee left over from the night before. Though he hated reheated coffee, he poured it into a saucepan and put it on a high flame, standing over it and waiting for it to boil. When it did, he poured the almost-viscous liquid into a cup, spooned in three sugars, and downed it quickly.

The bell to the apartment sounded, announcing the arrival of the police launch. He glanced at his watch. Eight minutes before six. It must be Montisi; no one else was capable of getting a boat here that quickly. He grabbed a wool jacket from the cupboard by the front door. September mornings could be cold, and there was always the chance of wind at Santi Giovanni e Paolo, so near to the open waters of the laguna.

At the bottom of the five flights of stairs, he pulled open the door to the building and found Puccetti, a recruit who had been with the police for fewer than five months.

'Buon giorno, Signor Commissario,' Puccetti said brightly and saluted, making far more noise and motion than Brunetti thought seemly at that hour.

Brunetti answered with a wave and headed down the narrow calle on which he lived. At the edge of the water, he saw the police launch moored to the landing, blue light flashing rhythmically. At the wheel, he recognized Montisi, a police pilot who had the blood of countless generations of Burano fishermen in his veins, blood that must certainly have been mixed with the waters of the laguna, carrying an instinctive knowledge of the tides and currents that would have allowed him to navigate the canals of the city with his eyes closed.

Montisi, stocky and heavy-bearded, acknowledged Brunetti's arrival with a nod, as much an acknowledgement of the hour as of his superior. Puccetti scrambled onto deck, joining a pair of uniformed policemen already there. One of them flicked the mooring cable free of the piling, and Montisi backed the boat quickly out into the Grand Canal, then swung it sharply around and back up towards the Rialto Bridge. They swept under the bridge and swung into a one-way canal on the right. Soon after that, they cut to the left, then again to the right. Brunetti stood on the deck, collar raised against the wind and the early-morning chill. Boats moored on either side of the canals bobbed in their wake, and others, coming in from San Erasmo with fresh fruit and vegetables, pulled to the side and hugged the buildings at the sight of their flashing blue light.

Finally, they turned into the Rio dei Mendicanti, the canal that flowed beside the hospital and out into the laguna, just opposite the cemetery. The proximity of the cemetery to the hospital was probably accidental; to most Venetians, however, particularly those who had survived treatment at the hospital, the location of the cemetery was a silent comment upon the proficiency of the hospital staff.

Halfway down the canal, clustered on the right, Brunetti saw a small group of people drawn up close to the edge of the embankment. Montisi stopped the boat fifty metres from the crowd in what Brunetti knew would be, by now, an entirely vain attempt to keep any evidence at the site free from the effects of their arrival.

One of the officers approached the boat and held out a hand to Brunetti to help him climb ashore. 'Buon giorno, Signor Commissario. We got him out, but, as you can see, we've already got company.' He gestured to nine or ten people crowding around something on the pavement, their bodies obscuring it from Brunetti's sight.

The officer turned back towards the crowd, saying as he walked, 'All right. Move back. Police.' At the approach of the two men, not at the command, the crowd pulled back.

On the pavement, Brunetti saw the body of a young man lying on his back, eyes open to the morning light. Beside him stood two policemen, uniforms soaked to their shoulders. Both of them saluted when they saw Brunetti. When their hands returned to their sides, water trickled to the ground beneath them. He recognized them, Luciani and Rossi, both good men.

'Well?' Brunetti asked, looking down at the dead man.

Luciani, the senior of the two, answered. 'He was floating in the canal when we got here, Dottore. A man in that house,' he said, pointing to an ochre building on the other side of the canal, 'called us. His wife saw him.'

Brunetti turned and looked across at the house. 'Fourth floor,' Luciani explained. Brunetti cast his eyes up, just in time to see a form pull back from the window. As he stared at the building and at those beside it, he noticed a number of dark shadows at the windows. Some retreated when he looked at them, others did not.

Brunetti turned back to Luciani and nodded to him to continue. 'He was near the steps, but we had to go in and pull him out. I put him on his back. To try to revive him. But there was no hope, sir. It looks like he's been dead a long time.' He sounded apologetic, almost as if his failure to breathe life back into the young man had somehow added to the finality of his death.

'Did you check the body?' Brunetti asked.

'No, sir. When we saw that there was nothing we could do, we thought it would be best to leave him for the doctor.'

'Good, good,' Brunetti muttered. Luciani shivered, either with cold or the awareness of his failure, and small drops of water fell to the pavement below him.

'You two get yourselves off home. Have a bath, get something to eat. And drink something against the chill.' Both men smiled at this, grateful for the suggestion. 'And take the launch. Montisi will take you home, both of you.'

The men thanked him and pushed their way through the crowd, which had grown larger in the few minutes Brunetti had been there. He gestured to one of the uniformed men who had come with him on the launch and told him, 'Move these people back, then get their names and addresses, all of them. Ask them when they got here, if they heard or saw anything strange this morning. Then send them home.' He hated the ghouls who always gathered at the scenes of death and could never understand the fascination so many of them had with it, especially in its more violent manifestations.

He looked again at the face of the young man on the pavement, now the object of so many pitiless stares. He was a handsome man, with short blond hair made darker by the water that still puddled around him. His eyes were a clear, limpid blue, his face symmetrical, nose narrow and fine.

Behind him, Brunetti heard the voices of the police as they began to move the crowd back. He called Puccetti over to him, ignoring the new salute the young man gave him. 'Puccetti, go over to that row of houses on the other side of the canal and see if anyone heard or saw anything.'

'For what time, sir?'

Brunetti thought for a moment, considering the moon. It had been new two nights ago: the tides would not have been strong enough to carry the body very far at all. He would have to ask Montisi about last night's tides. The hands of the dead man were strangely shrivelled and white, a sure sign he had been in the water for a long time. Once he knew how long the young man had been dead, he'd leave it to Montisi to calculate how far he could have drifted. And from where. In the meantime, there was Puccetti. 'Ask them for any time last night. And get some barriers set up. Send those people home if you can.' Little chance of that, he knew. Venice had few events like this to offer its citizens; they would leave only reluctantly.

He heard the sound of another boat approaching. A second white police launch, blue light pulsing round, pulled into the canal and stopped at the same mooring Montisi had used. This one also carried three men in uniform and one in civilian clothing. Like sunflowers, the faces of the crowd turned from the sun of their attention, the dead man, and swirled around towards the men who jumped down from the boat and approached the crowd.

At their head walked Doctor Ettore Rizzardi, the Coroner for the city. Unperturbed by the stares he was receiving, Doctor Rizzardi approached and extended his hand in a friendly fashion to Brunetti. 'Buon di, Guido. What is it?'

Brunetti stepped aside so that Rizzardi could see what lay at their feet. 'He was in the canal. Luciani and Rossi pulled him out, but there was nothing they could do. Luciani tried, but it was too late.'

Rizzardi nodded and grunted at this. The shrivelled skin of the hands told him how late it had been for any help.

'It looks like he's been in there for a long time, Ettore. But I'm sure you can tell me better.'

Taking this compliment as no more than his due, Rizzardi turned his full attention to the corpse. As he bent over the body, the whispers of the crowd grew even more sibilant. He ignored them, placed his bag carefully in a dry spot near the body, and stooped down over the corpse.

Brunetti wheeled around and walked towards the people who stood in what had now become the front rank of the crowd.

'If you've given your names and addresses, you can go. There's nothing more to see. So you can go, all of you.' An old man with a grizzled beard bent sharply to the left to look past Brunetti and see what the doctor was doing over the body. 'I said you can go.' Brunetti spoke directly to the old man. He straightened up, glanced at Brunetti with complete lack of interest, then bent back down, interested only in the doctor. An old woman yanked angrily at the leash of her terrier and went off, visibly outraged by yet more evidence of police brutality. The uniformed men moved slowly among the crowd, turning them gently with a word or a hand on the shoulder, gradually forcing them to move away, abandoning the area to the police. The last to leave was the old man with the beard, who moved only as far as the iron railing enclosing the base of the statue of Colleoni, against which he leaned, refusing to abandon the campo or his rights as a citizen.

‘Guido, come here a moment,’ Rizzardi called from behind him.

Brunetti turned and went to stand beside the kneeling doctor, who held back the dead man’s shirt. About five inches above his waist, on the left side, Brunetti saw a horizontal line, jagged at the edges, flesh strangely greyish-blue. He knelt beside Rizzardi in a chill pool of water to get a closer look. The cut was about as long as his thumb and now, probably because of the body’s long immersion, gaped open, curiously bloodless.

‘This isn’t some tourist who got drunk and fell into a canal, Guido.’

Brunetti nodded in silent agreement. ‘What could do something like that?’ he asked, nodding towards the wound.

‘A knife. Wide-bladed. And whoever did it was either very good or very lucky.’

‘Why do you say that?’ Brunetti asked.

‘I don’t want to poke around in there too much, not until I can open him up and see it properly,’ Rizzardi said. ‘But if the angle is right, and that’s indicated by what I can see from here, then he had a clear path right to the heart. No ribs in the way. Nothing. Just the least little push, the least little bit of pressure, and he's dead.' Rizzardi repeated, 'Either very good or very lucky.'

Brunetti could see only the width of the wound; he had no idea of the path it would have followed within the body. 'Could it have been anything else? I mean, other than a knife?'

'I can't be sure until I get a closer look at the tissue inside, but I doubt it.'

'What about drowning? If it didn't get his heart, could he still have drowned?'

Rizzardi sat back on his heels, careful to pull the folds of his raincoat under him to keep them from the water below. 'No, I doubt it. If it missed the heart, there wouldn't have been enough damage to keep him from pulling himself out of the water. Just look at how pale he is. I think that's what happened. One blow. The right angle. Death would have been almost immediate.' He pushed himself to his feet and delivered the closest thing the young man was to get to a prayer that morning. 'Poor devil. He's a handsome young man, and he's in excellent physical shape. I'd say he was an athlete or at least someone who took very good care of himself.' He bent back over the body and, with a gesture that seemed curiously paternal, he moved his hand down across his eyes, trying to force them closed. One refused to move. The other closed for a moment, then slowly slid open and stared again at the sky. Rizzardi muttered something to himself, took a handkerchief from his breast pocket, and placed it across the face of the young man.

'Cover his face. He died young,' muttered Brunetti.

'What?'

Brunetti shrugged. 'Nothing. Something Paola says.' He looked away from the face of the young man and studied, for the briefest of instants, the façade of the basilica and allowed himself to be calmed by its symmetry. 'When can you tell me something exact, Ettore?'

Rizzardi gave a quick look at his watch. 'If your boys can take him out to the cemetery now, I can get to him later this morning. Give me a call after lunch, and I'll be able to tell you exactly. But I don't think there's any doubt, Guido.' The doctor hesitated, not liking to have to tell Brunetti how to do his job. 'Aren't you going to check his pockets?'

Though he had done it many times in his career, Brunetti hated this first invasion of the privacy of the dead, this first awful imposition of the power of the State on the peace of the departed. He disliked having to go through their diaries and drawers, to page through their letters, finger their clothing.

But since the body had already been moved from where it had been found, there was no reason to leave it untouched until the photographer could record where it lay in the precise posture of death. He squatted beside the young man and reached a hand into his trouser pocket. At the bottom he found a few coins and placed them beside the body. In the other there was a plain metal ring with four keys attached. Unmasked, Rizzardi bent down to help shift the body to its side so that Brunetti could reach into the back pockets. One held a sodden yellow rectangle, clearly a train ticket, and the other a paper napkin, equally sodden. He nodded to Rizzardi, and they lowered the body back to the ground.

He picked up one of the coins and held it out to the doctor.

'What is it?' asked Rizzardi.

'American. Twenty-five cents.' It seemed a strange thing to find in the pocket of a dead man in Venice.

'Ah, that could be it,' the doctor said. 'An American.'

'What?'

'Why he's in such good shape,' Rizzardi answered, entirely unconscious of the bitter incongruity of the tense. 'That might explain it. They're always so fit, so healthy.' Together, they looked at the body, at the narrow waist that showed under the still-open shirt.

'If he is,' Rizzardi said, 'the teeth will tell me.'

'Why?'

'Because of the dental work. They use different techniques, better materials. If he's had any dental work done, I'll be able to tell you this afternoon if he's American.'

Had Brunetti been a different man, he might have asked Rizzardi to take a look now, but he saw no need to hurry, nor did he want to disturb that young face again. 'Thanks, Ettore. I'll send a photographer out to take some pictures. Do you think you can get his eyes closed?'

'Of course. I'll have him looking as much like himself as I can. But you'll want his eyes open for the pictures, won't you?'

Just by a breath, Brunetti stopped himself from saying he never wanted those eyes open again and, instead, answered, 'Yes, yes, of course.'

'And send someone to take the fingerprints, Guido.'

'Yes.'

'All right. Then call me about three.' They shook hands briefly, and Doctor Rizzardi picked up his bag. Without saying goodbye, he walked across the open space towards the monumental open portal of the hospital, two hours early for work.

More officers had arrived while they were examining the body, and now there must have been eight of them, formed in an outward-facing arc about three metres from the body. 'Sergeant Vianello,' Brunetti called, and one of them stepped back from the line and came to join him beside the body.

'Get two of your men to take him to the launch, then take him out to the cemetery.'

While this was being done, Brunetti returned to his examination of the front of the basilica, letting his eyes flow up and around its soaring spires. His eyes shifted across the campo to the statue of Colleoni, perhaps a witness to the crime.

Vianello came up beside him. 'I've sent him out to the cemetery, sir. Anything else?'

'Yes. Is there a bar around here?'

'Over there, sir, behind the statue. It opens at six.'

'Good. I need a coffee.' As they walked towards the bar, Brunetti began to give orders. 'We'll need divers, a pair of them. Get them busy in the water where the body was found. I want them to bring up anything that could be a weapon: a knife, blade about three centimetres wide. But it might have been something else, even a piece of metal, so have them bring up anything that might have made a wound like that. Tools, anything.'

'Yes, sir,' Vianello said, trying to write this in his notebook while walking.

'Doctor Rizzardi will give us a time of death this afternoon. As soon as we have it, I want to see Montisi.'

'For the tides, sir?' Vianello asked, understanding immediately.

'Yes. And start calling the hotels. See if anyone is missing from his room, especially Americans.' He knew the men disliked this, the endless calls to the hotels, pages and pages of them on the police list. And after they'd called the hotels, there remained the pensions and hostels, more pages of names and numbers.

The steamy warmth of the bar was comforting and familiar, as were the smells of coffee and pastry. A man and woman standing at the counter glanced at the uniformed man, then went back to their conversation. Brunetti asked for espresso, Vianello for caffè corretto, black coffee with a substantial splash of grappa. When the barman put their coffees in front of them, both spooned in two sugars and cradled the warm cups in their hands for a moment.

Vianello downed his coffee in one gulp, set the cup back on the counter, and asked, 'Anything else, sir?'

'See about drug dealing in the neighbourhood. Who does it, and where? See if there's anyone in the neighbourhood with a record of drug arrests or street crimes: selling, using, stealing, anything. And find out where they go to shoot up, any of those calle that dead-end into the canal, if there's a place where syringes turn up in the morning.'

'You think it's a drug crime, sir?'

Brunetti finished his coffee and nodded to the barman for another. Without being asked, Vianello shook his head in a quick negative. 'I don't know. It's possible. So let's check that first.'

Vianello nodded and wrote in his notebook. Finished, he slipped it into his breast pocket and began to reach for his wallet.

'No, no,' Brunetti insisted. 'I'll get it. Go back to the boat and call about the divers. And have your men set up barricades. Get the entrances to the canal blocked off while the divers work.'

Vianello nodded his thanks for the coffee and left. Through the steamy windows of the bar, Brunetti saw the ebb and flow of people across the campo. He watched as they came down from the main bridge that led to the hospital, noticed the police at their right, and asked the people standing around what was going on. Usually, they paused, looking from the dark uniforms that still milled around to the police launch that bobbed at the side of the canal. Then, seeing nothing at all out of the ordinary beyond that, they continued about their business. The old man, he saw, still leaned against the iron railing. Even after all his years of police work, he could not understand how people could so willingly place themselves near the death of their own kind. It was a mystery he had never been able to penetrate, that awful fascination with the termination of life, especially when it was violent, as this had been.

He turned back to his second coffee and drank it quickly. 'How much?' he asked.

'Five thousand lire.'

He paid with a ten and waited for his change. When he handed it to Brunetti, the barman asked, 'Something bad, sir?'

'Yes, something bad,' Brunetti answered. 'Something very bad.'

2

Because the Questura was so near, it was easier for Brunetti to walk to his office than go back on the launch with the uniformed men. He went the back way, passing the Evangelical church and coming up on the Questura from the right side of the building. The uniformed man at the front entrance opened the heavy glass door as soon as he saw Brunetti, who headed for the stairway that would take him to his office on the fourth floor, passing beside the line of foreigners seeking residence and work permits, a line that extended halfway across the lobby.

His desk, when he reached his office, was just as he had left it the day before, covered with papers and files sprawled across it in no particular order. The ones nearest to hand contained personnel reports, all of which he had to read and comment upon as part of the Byzantine process of promotion through which all State employees had to go. The second pile dealt with the last murder in the city, the brutal, crazed beating to death of a young man that had taken place a month ago on the embankment of the Zattere. So savagely had he been beaten that the police were at first sure it was the work of a gang. Instead, after only a day, they had discovered that the killer was a frail wisp of a boy of sixteen. The victim was homosexual, and the killer's father a known Fascist who had instilled in his son the doctrines that Communists and gays were vermin who deserved only death. So, at five one bright summer morning, these two young men had come together in a deadly trajectory beside the waters of the Giudecca Canal. No one knew what had passed between them, but the victim had been reduced to such a state that the family had been denied the right to see his body, which had been consigned to them in a sealed coffin. The piece of wood which had been used to beat and stab him to death sat in a plastic box inside a filing cabinet on the second floor of the Questura. Little remained to be done, save to see that the psychiatric treatment of the killer continued and he was not allowed to leave the city. The State made no provision for psychiatric treatment for the family of the victim.

Instead of sitting at his desk, Brunetti reached into one of the side drawers and pulled out an electric razor. He stood at his window to shave, staring out at the façade of the church of San Lorenzo, still covered, as it had been for the last five years, with the scaffolding behind which extensive restoration was said to be taking place. He had no proof that this was happening, for nothing had changed in all these years, and the front doors of the church remained forever closed.

His phone rang, the direct line from outside. He glanced at his watch. Nine-thirty. That would be the vultures. He switched off the razor and walked over to his desk to answer the phone.

'Brunetti.'

'Buon giorno, Commissario. This is Carlon,' a deep voice said and went on, quite unnecessarily, to identify himself as the Crime Reporter for the Gazzettino.

'Buon giorno, Signor Carlon.' Brunetti knew what Carlon wanted; let him ask.

'Tell me about that American you pulled out of the Rio dei Mendicanti this morning.'

'It was officer Luciani who pulled him out, and we have no evidence that he was American.'

'I stand corrected, Dottore,' Carlon said with a sarcasm that turned apology to insult. When Brunetti didn't respond, he asked, 'He was murdered, wasn't he?' making little attempt to disguise his pleasure at the possibility.

'It would appear so.'

'Stabbed?'

How did they learn so much, and so quickly?
'Yes.'

'Murdered?' Carlon repeated, voice heavy with feigned patience.

'We won't have any final word until we get the results of the autopsy that Doctor Rizzardi is conducting this afternoon.'

'Was there a stab wound?'

'Yes, there was.'

'But you're not sure the stab wound was the cause of death?' Carlon's question ended with an incredulous snort.

'No, we're not,' Brunetti replied blandly. 'As I explained to you, nothing will be certain until we have the results of the autopsy.'

'Other signs of violence?' Carlon asked, displeased at how little information he was getting.

'Not until after the autopsy,' Brunetti repeated.

'Next, are you going to suggest he might have drowned, Commissario?'

'Signor Carlon,' Brunetti said, deciding that he had had enough, 'as you well know, if he was in the water of one of our canals for any length of time, then it is far more likely that disease would have killed him than that he would have drowned.' From the other end, only silence. 'If you'll be kind enough to call me this afternoon, about four, I'll be glad to give you more accurate information.' It was Carlon whose reporting had caused the story of the last murder to become an exposé of the private life of the victim, and Brunetti still felt enormous rancour because of it.

'Thank you, Commissario. I'll certainly do that. One thing – what was the name of that officer again?'

'Luciani, Mario Luciani, an exemplary officer.'

As all of them were when Brunetti mentioned them to the Press.

'Thank you, Commissario. I'll make a note of that. And I'll be sure to mention your cooperation in my article.' With no further ado, Carlon hung up.

In the past, Brunetti's dealings with the Press had been relatively friendly, at times more than that, and at times he had even used the Press to solicit information about a crime. But in recent years, the ever-strengthening wave of sensationalistic journalism had prevented any dealings with reporters that were more than purely formal; every speculation he might voice would be sure to appear the following day as an almost direct accusation of guilt. So Brunetti had become cautious, providing information that was severely limited, however accurate and true reporters might know it to be.

He realized that, until he heard from the lab about the ticket in the man's pocket or until he got the report on the autopsy, there was very little he could do. The men in the lower offices would be calling the hotels now, and they would inform him if they turned up something. Consequently, there was nothing for him to do but continue to read and sign the personnel reports.

An hour later, just before eleven, the buzzer on his intercom sounded. He picked up the receiver, knowing too well who it would be. 'Yes, Vice-Questore?'

Momentarily surprised at being directly addressed, having hoped, perhaps, to have found Brunetti absent or asleep, his superior, Vice-Questore Patta, took a moment to respond. 'What's all this about the dead American, Brunetti? Why wasn't I called? Have you any idea of what this will do to tourism?' Brunetti suspected that the third question was the only one in which Patta took any real interest.

'What American, sir?' Brunetti asked, voice filled with feigned curiosity.

'The American you pulled out of the water this morning.'

'Oh,' Brunetti said, this time with polite surprise. 'Is the report back so soon? He was American, then?'

'Don't be cute with me, Brunetti,' Patta said angrily. 'The report isn't back yet, but he had American coins in his pocket, so he's got to be an American.'

'Or a numismatist,' Brunetti suggested amiably.

There followed a long pause which told Brunetti the Vice-Questore didn't know the meaning of the word.

'I told you not to be smart, Brunetti. We're going to work on the assumption that he's an American. We can't have Americans being murdered in this city, not with the state of tourism this year. Do you understand that?'

Brunetti fought back the impulse to ask if it would be all right to kill people of other nationalities – Albanians, perhaps? – but, instead, said only, 'Yes, sir.'

'Well?'

'Well what, sir?'

'What have you done?'

'Divers are searching the canal where he was found. When we find out when he died, we'll have them search the places from where he might have drifted, assuming he was killed somewhere else. Vianello is checking for drug use or dealing in the neighbourhood, and the lab is working on the things we found in his pockets.'

'Those coins?'

'I'm not sure we need the lab to tell us they're American, sir.'

After a long silence that said it would not be wise to bait Patta any further, his superior asked, 'What about Rizzardi?'

'He said he'd have the report to me this afternoon.'

'See that I'm sent a copy of it,' he ordered.

'Yes, sir. Will there be anything else?'

'No, that's all.' Patta replaced his phone without saying anything else, and Brunetti went back to reading the reports.

When he finished with them, it was after one. Because he didn't know when Rizzardi would call, and because he wanted to get the report as quickly as possible, he decided not to go home for lunch, nor spend the time going to a restaurant, though he was hungry after the long morning. He decided to go down to the bar at the foot of Ponte dei Greci and make do with a few tramezzini.

When he walked in, Arianna, the owner, greeted him by name and automatically placed a wine glass on the counter in front of him. Orso, her ancient German shepherd, who had developed a special fondness for Brunetti over the course of the years, hauled himself arthritically to his feet from his regular place beside the ice-cream cooler and tottered over to him. He waited long enough for Brunetti to pat him on the head and pull gently at his ears and then collapsed in a heap at his feet. The many regulars in the bar were accustomed to stepping over Orso and tossing him bits of crusts and sandwiches. He was especially fond of asparagus.

'What would you like, Guido?' Arianna asked, meaning tramezzini and automatically pouring him a glass of red wine.

'Give me a ham and artichoke, and one with shrimp.' Fan-like, Orso's tail began to beat softly against his ankle. 'And one asparagus.' When the sandwiches came, he asked for another glass of wine and drank it slowly, thinking of the way things would be complicated if the dead man did turn out to be American. He didn't know if there would be questions of jurisdiction, decided not to think about that.

As if to prevent him, Arianna said, 'Too bad about the American.'

'We're not sure that he is, not yet.'

'Well, if he is, then someone is going to start crying "terrorism", and that's not going to do anyone any good.' Though she was Yugoslavian by birth, her thinking was entirely Venetian: business first and above all.

'There are lots of drugs in that neighbourhood,' she added, as if talking about it could make drugs be the cause. He remembered that she also owned